We all know the story: A group of 20-something friends set up a high-tech start-up in their parents' garage. All they've got is some money they have saved, burning ambition and the dream of the high-tech generation: to sell their company for millions some day.

After ten years of crazed work, the four founders (and best friends) of Gymalaya realize their dream and sell the company to a giant American corporation for $217 million. Now they can live out all of their fantasies, but it's not at all sure they will be any happier... The guys at Gymalaya strike gold with their start-up but the morning after their dream came true also marks the start of a no-less-difficult journey in an attempt to keep their sanity, their friendship and, of course, the money...

With their new found wealth they begin living out their wildest fantasies: Buying a super-luxury mansion, an outrageously expensive car, a private jet, a football team, settle the score with the bank manager who made their lives miserable, and dating the most beautiful girls in town.

The lives of the foursome change overnight and they quickly learn that their different characters and outlook on life threatens to tear them apart: One wants to live the good life, and splurges on everything money can buy, while the other wants to keep his day job and maintain his normal life. The third becomes riddled with anxieties, afraid that the money will run out any second, and the fourth one doesn't really comprehend what's going on...
